OLD AND NEW.

Mr. Hale is making of this magazine, which is now grown old enough to be talked of as quite established, something different from anything attempted by any of its competitors. "I do not make it," he said once, "for the literary class; if there is any such class, which I doubt, I make it for the great mass of readers of average intelligence, the product of our common schools." A result of his plan is that the magazine is crowded with short articles and covers a great variety of subjects. Much of the writing is not particularly clever, but is nearly all noticeable for having something to say. If the style is less ambitious than are likely to be more ideas to the column than we are always certain of in more pretentious quarters. Through it all, besides, there run traces of the exquisite taste and quite unique genius of Mr. Hale himself. Of all the contributors to the number, Mr. Hale is easily the chief. Beside him, we have a hearty eulogy for Bryant's Elmira; an account of Paraguay, by Mr. Porter C. Elmer, in which we should have more faith if it were written by almost anybody else; a continuation of Mrs. Stowe's novella, "Pink and White Tycoon," a good article on the Church of the Latter Day Saints, an amusing and altogether extraordinary piece of autobiography by Mr. Ralph Keeler, with a variety of lighter contributions, a really valuable record of progress, and the careful criticisms in the Examiner department. Altogether, Old and New makes steady progress, and fully deserves the high and peculiar rank it has taken among our magazines.
